I forgot to mark this one as read because finishing it was not a tremendously memorable event. The cover is gorgeous but there is something about the story that felt a bit off to me. I found it somewhat confusing as a read aloud book because it jumped around to tell the story in an attempt to slowly reveal plot details. Good but not amazing.

This was a nice quick read that held more emotions than seemed possible for such a short book.

I saw this on display at my library and decided to pick it up, it looked intriguing because it was told from the dogs point of view and seemed to maybe be wintery because of the snow. (I'm trying to get into the Christmas spirit sort of). Since it was a Juvenile book and less than 90 pages I thought, why not?

The flashbacks to the dog's time with Sylvan, the poet, really added on a bit of dept

The flashbacks to the dog's time with Sylvan, the poet, really added on a bit of depth and tragedy to the story. However I did not cry...I felt sad and a bit taken aback at some parts but no tears. It just wasn't too much substance to get attached to, I guess.

I kept questioning the reality and how much of the story actually happened...(I've read too many books to not think that a twist could be coming up or that everything is imaginary, or something like that.)

I noticed some things...So how did Teddy not know Flora and Nickle's father, if he had gone to class at the Poet's house before, and how did he know about the poem Sylvan wrote, like how long ago was Teddy adopted?... Maybe I'm just missing it, but idk. And how old is Teddy? And is it just a coincidence that Teddy is the same breed and looks just like Ruby's old dog? And how did Sylvan come up with the "prophecy" of the two jewels? Idk? seems a bit sketchy to me but then I tell myself that this story is told by a dog, and how serious is this book? I'm just confusing myself...and none of that probably even happened, and it was just the dogs imagination...Im overthinking everything and I think it is time to stop now.

A charming little fable about children, lost during a snowstorm, who are taken in by a dog. Because, you see, children and poets can understand dogs when they speak, and so Teddy and Nickel and Flora wait out the storm, eating delicious things cooked by little Flora, and hearing stories from Teddy about his person, the poet Sylvan. A wonderful winter book!

This is quite...slight. I'm sure a certain type of person would find it profound and beautiful, but that person is emphatically not me.
