I was excited when I won this book through a Goodreads give-away. A.J. Banner is a new author to me and I thought this sounded like an interesting read.

Kyra Winthrop is a 34-year-old Marine biologist who has lost her memory after suffering from a head injury she received in a diving accident. She hit her head on a rock and spent a week in intensive care, then over two months in rehab. Physically she's almost completely better but her memory is another story.

Just how much can we trust the people around us? Right now Kyra is having to trust people without remembering who they are....most importantly her husband, Jacob.

How can you not remember the husband you have been married to for three years? It sounds unbelievable but Kyra really doesn't know her husband. She is suffering from a complex form of amnesia and doesn't remember anything from the last four years.

Jacob says they have a wonderful and happy marriage. He's been patient as Kyra essentially gets to know him all over again. She sees all of the pictures from their life, including her wedding pictures. However, Jacob does seem to get annoyed when certain questions are asked.

Could Jacob be keeping something from her?

The characters, the Pacific Northwest setting and the tragedy of it all sucked me in. I found myself completely enamored with this story of a wife that suffered a head injury during a scuba diving excursion and a husband who's desperate for her to regain her memories of their life together. It's all very harrowing and incredibly sweet. Or is it?

The characters, the Pacific Northwest setting and the tragedy of it all sucked me in. I found myself completely enamored with this story of a wife that suffered a head injury during a scuba diving excursion and a husband who's desperate for her to regain her memories of their life together. It's all very harrowing and incredibly sweet. Or is it?

Can you imagine, not remembering anything from the last four years of your life? Poof . . . all of your memories are just gone, erased, vanished. Only a few scars left in their place instead. You don't remember marrying your husband, the accident that stole all of those precious moments or even agreeing to move to the house you find yourself living in now. That's the reality Kyra's living.

Until the jarring snippets of her memory start to return and they don't make sense. Kyra's head is a jumbled mess and no one can give her any solace, not even her husband, Jacob. Did she make a terrible mistake before the accident?

Piecing them together seemed like Kyra's only shot for getting to the truth and I wanted a front row seat.

And what about her husband, Jacob? Sure he's doting and caring, but at a point it starts to feel like he's incredibly controlling and impatient. Why? Is it just the fear of losing her that's driving his need to know what she's up to at every moment? I can't tell you the number of times my feelings for him wavered! I couldn't decide if he was just overly cautious, he did witness the accident after all, or if there was something more sinister going on. No spoilers here - my lips are sealed.

is masterful at creating doubt.

I kind of had an inkling of what was going on, but I didn't want to believe it. I managed to push my theories to the back of my mind and get lost in the suspense of it all. I ended up knocking this out in two sittings because it was

My only wish - I wanted a tiny bit more of a confrontation at the end. Ever the critic, I felt like things were wrapped up too quickly and neatly for my tastes. That's not to say this wasn't a Deception. And heavy on the saltwater here.

Kyra Winthrop is a marine biologist from Seattle University who is recovering from a traumatic brain injury while diving three months ago. She and her husband, Jacob, are living in his parents' old house on Mystic Island in the Pacific Northwest as a refuge during her recovery.

Kyra is suffering from a "brain reset" in which there is much in the way of a disconnect in her memory log. Bits and pieces shift back and forth never quite locking cohesively together. Jacob, patiently, watches over her and constantly provides a safety net as Kyra tries to make sense of everything. "There isn't any map for recovery, except the one you create for yourself."

And create it should have. The Twilight Wife had all the markings of a really good read in the beginning. But then there were dark passages that should have been enhanced and more secrets and backstory that should have been explored. This storyline demanded a higher level of tension and excitement. It never came. It seemed to fall into the trap of a movie of the week syndrome. Plenty of going through the motions and bike rides, but this never had the element of gaslighting and eeriness that were so desperately needed. Even the ending was wrapped in seashell gift paper.

Perhaps, dear reader, you may find this story intriguing. But intrigue, the deep burden of fear, and the intense shifting sand should have been the bows on this package. Instead, we watched the slight fraying of wrapping twine.

The events in this novel slowly unfold. At times, I was waiting for something to happen, but I was happy with the pay off in the end. I also felt like the ending deserved more attention—it felt rushed and left me with questions.

Overall, this book didn't knock my socks off, but it has potential!

Kyra begins to have flashes of memories prior to her accident. Sometimes a scent or a person she meets in town provides her with glimpses of her past life. The combination of these memories and those provided by her husband have her struggling and confused in putting her history together. She becomes suspicious and begins to feel that the landscape of her past is disjointed.

This psychological thriller starts out calm and then midway shifts with unanticipated twists and turns. The book is well narrated and the story flows well. The details in Kyra's flashbacks provide the backdrop to the tension that builds throughout the story. I enjoyed this novel!
